1 Originally, the length of the furrow in the common field, which was theoretically regarded as a square containing ten acres. As a lineal measure, the furlong therefore varied according to the extent assigned at various times and places to the ACRE, but was usually understood to be equal to 40 poles (rods, perches). As early as the 9th c. it was regarded as the equivalent of the Roman stadium, which was ⅛ of a Roman mile, and hence furlong has always been used as a name for the eighth part of an English mile, whether this coincided with the agricultural measure so called or not. The present statute furlong is 220 yards, and is equal both to the eighth part of a statute mile, and to the side of a square of 10 statute acres

Fy, obs form of Fie

Fy- see also Fi-

-fy (fai), suffix, forming verbs The older Eng vbs in -fy are adoptions of Fr vbs in -fier, which are either adapted from Lat. vbs in -ficāre or formed on the analogy of vbs so originating (The form -fier was used as the representative of L -ficāre on the analogy of words like saintefier—sanctificāre.) The Lat vbs in -ficāre were originally derivatives of adjs in -fic-us (see -fic), though subsequently the suffix could be used to form vbs without the intervention of an adj They may be divided into three classes (corresponding to three classes of adjectives in -ficus see -fic), all of which are represented by adapted words in Eng (1) vbs f sbs, with the sense 'to make, produce', as pācificāre (orig intr to make peace) pacify, ædificāre edify, or 'to make or convert into something', as deificāre deify, (2) f adjs, with the sense 'to bring into a certain state', as sanctificāre sanctify, (3) f. vb. stems, with causative sense, as horrificāre horrify In med L there was a tendency to substitute -ficāre for -facĕre in the few Lat vbs. so ending, and hence Fr and Eng vbs in -fier, -fy sometimes correspond to Lat vbs in -facĭo, e g F stupefier (but in pa pple stupéfait as well as stupefié) stupefy, OF satisfaire (but mod F. satisfaire) satisfy, F liquefier liquefy, F. rubéfier rubefy, med L calefĭcare calefy. Exc in the case of these few vbs the ending has normally the form -sfy (for the reason see FIC) It is now used as the regular rendering of -ficāre in new words adopted from Lat or formed on assumable Lat types, and is also freely added to Eng adjs and sbs to form vbs., mostly somewhat jocular or trivial, with the senses 'to make a specified thing', as speechify, 'to assimilate to the character of something' (chiefly in pa pple, as countrified), 'to invest with certain attributes', as Frenchify (A large proportion of these vbs are from sbs and adjs ending in y or -cy, the suffix then having the form -fy instead of the usual -ify An early example is beautify, but the analogy on which this word was formed is not clear.) In a few cases the suffix has been quite irregularly added to vb stems, but the words are either obsolete, as dedify, hundify, ornify, or merely jocular or illiterate, as argufy The noun of action related to vbs. in -sfy normally ends in -sfication, though, by confusion of suffix, petrifaction is used in Eng where Fr has more correctly pétrification The words in which -fy represents L -facĕre have the noun corresponding to nouns of action ending in -faction
The following examples illustrate the freedom with which this suffix has been used in the formation of nonce-words
1602 Dekker Satiromastix Liva, Nay by Sesu you shall bee a Poet, though not Lawrefyed, yet Nettlefyed so. 1647 Ward Comm Ephes IV 18 But speaking the truth Doing the truth Truthifying 1773 S J Pratt Liberal Opin (1783) II 260 Not that I would have you suppose I am bigotted to frippery, even though you now see me so apefied 1790 A Seward Lett (1811) II 381 Though fashion has now bullified us all 1834 Southey Doctor II. G.

G (dʒī), the seventh letter of the Roman alphabet, was originally a differentiated form of C, for its early history see that letter In Latin G represented the voiced guttural stop; but in the later period of the language it must have been pronounced before front vowels as a palatal, its representation in the Rom langs being precisely the same as that of Lat. I consonant (J), hence in OF. G before e, i was pronounced like J, viz as the assibilated (dʒ)

In OE. the letter stood for four different sounds, viz the voiced guttural and palatal stop (in this Dictionary represented by g, g), and the voiced guttural and palatal spirant (here printed ȝ, ɣ) The precise distribution of these sounds is much disputed, but if we confine our view to the very end of the OE period the following statements may be made Initial G before back vowels was a guttural stop (g), developed from an earlier spirant Initial G before front vowels was a palatal spirant (y) Medially and finally, G represented a guttural or a palatal, according to the nature of the associated sounds, in the combinations ng and gg (written cg when palatal, rarely when guttural) it was a stop, and in other positions a spirant In early ME, or perh in late OE, the palatal stop developed into the complex sound (dʒ), thus coinciding with the power of G before e, i, in contemporary French

In early ME the continental form of G (approximately g) was used for the two sounds which the letter had in French, (g) and (dʒ), while the OE form ȝ was used for the sounds peculiar to native words, viz the guttural and palatal spirants (ɣ, y) Ormin attempted to differentiate the symbol g into two, g = (dʒ), and ȝ = (g), but his example was not followed The symbol ȝ gradually came to assume a form indistinguishable from that used for Z in contemporary MSS, in this Dictionary the form ȝ is employed for ME. words This symbol was commonly used in ME for the sound of (y) initial and final, for the guttural and palatal unvoiced spirant final or before t (as in snouȝ, auȝt, niȝt, OE genōh, āht, mihte), and, so long as the sound remained in the language, for the guttural voiced spirant From the 13th c, however, the ȝ was by some scribes wholly or partially discarded for y or gh, a few texts have yh In the 15th c vocabularies the words beginning with ȝ are at the end of the alphabet Caxton uses the symbol sparingly, chiefly before final t. The English printers of the 16th c scarcely use it at all, but in Scotland it survived longer, and has left a trace in the use of z for y in the spelling of surnames like Menzies and Dalziel, and of such words as capercaitzie, gabe lunzie

In modern English G has the so called 'hard' sound (g) at the end of a word, before a consonant or a, o, u, (exc in gaol, gaoler), and in words of Teutonic etymology before e and i, as in give, get, also in Hebrew proper names, as Gethsemane, Gideon In words from Lat or Romanic it has the 'soft' sound (dʒ) before e, i, y, and at the end of a syllable, in words of whatever origin, the sound (dʒ) is represented always by dge or ge, the letter J not being used in this position The combination gn is sounded n initially or at the end of a syllable When the combination ng occurs in one syllable, the g is now silent, serving only to give to the n the value of (ŋ) With regard to the pronunciation of ng in the middle of a disyllable, modern usage is somewhat inconsistent in the inflexions and derivatives of verbs the g is silent, as in sanger, sangeth, singing (sɛ̃ŋə, si ŋɪŋ, si ŋɪŋ), but is sounded in the comparatives and superlatives of adjs., as in younger, longer (yʌ ŋgəɹ, lɔ̃ŋgəɹ), and the other words generally, as finger (fi ŋgəɹ)

The combination gh is in a few words (aghast, ghastly, ghost) a mere capricious substitute for g (cf Caxton's frequent ghoos, ghoot, gherle = goose, goat, girl) Elsewhere it chiefly represents the older guttural or palatal spirant (OE g or h), which in modern pronunciation is either dropped, as in high, night, through, plough, or replaced by (f), as in laugh, rough, tough; a special development has taken place in hough (hɔk).

II Used as a symbol, with reference to its place (7th) in the alphabet.

Woordenb*) the senses 'pimple or blister generally, barren spot in a field, flaw or rotten place in a rock', etc. All these words are in the several langs formally identical with those repr GALL sb 1, and it seems not unlikely that they may be actually identical; the notion of 'venom' (GALL sb 5) passes easily into that of 'envenomed sore' (cf FELON sb 2), the other senses illustrated below may be explained as referring to the gall as a part of the carcass which has to be removed as useless and offensive. The ON and MSw. galle wk masc, 'fault, defect' (in phrases equivalent to 'without gall'), seems to admit of the same explanation.

It is, however, probable that words of different etymology have influenced the sense development in the Eng and other Teut langs In the Rom langs the word for GALL sb 1 (F galle, It gala, Sp agalla) was used for a swelling on the fetlock of a horse (see Ger Hasgalle, wundgalle, Eng WINDGALL), and ger writers of the 16th c argue that the word ought, being a transferred use of galle gall nut, to be limited to this specific meaning In Eng the word seems to have been influenced (through GALL 7?) by OF galler, galer to rub, scrub, scall, powdily also by F galle fem, itch, scurf, scab also, flaw in cloth, whence Du gaal, the source of these words is unknown, one suggestion being that they are derived from L. galla GALL sb 1

Gallant (gæ lănt, gălæ̈nt), a and sb Forms 4–6 galaunt(e, 5–8 galant(e, 5–6 Sc galland, 6 gallante, -aunt, -aunde, 6– gallant. [a F galant (recorded from the 14th c), pa pple of OF galer to make merry, make a show, (connected with gale merrymaking = It, Sp gala, see GALE *sb*2 and GALA) The early senses of the adj in Fr are 'dashing, spirited, bold' (obsolete in Fr., but the source of the prevailing sense in mod Eng), 'gay in appearance, handsome, gaily attired', and 'fitted for the pleasures of society, attractive in manners, courteous, polished'. The last of these gave rise in mod Fr to the specialized senses 'politely attentive to women', and 'amorous, amatory', which were adopted into Eng in the 17th c., and are usually distinguished by the accentuation galla nt. The It. galante, courteous, honourable, and Sp galante, gally dressed, sprightly, galan, galano gally dressed, seemed to have been adopted from French The use as sb, which is recorded in Eng. somewhat earlier than the adjectival use, was adopted from Fr, in which language all the senses of the sb. had been developed

The origin of the OFr verb galer is disputed. The view of Diez, that it was f the OHG geil = ML. Goic, wanton, is now abandoned, as the normal Central French form on that supposition should begin with y, the form galer for which waler occurs as a variant points to an original initial w Hence most recent scholars regard the vb as ad OHG wallôn to wander, go on pilgrimage, but the transition of sense offers difficulties that are not fully cleared up]

1 An apparatus for inflicting the punishment of death by hanging, usually consisting of two uprights and a cross-piece, from which the criminal is suspended by the neck Sometimes used as equivalent to CROSS See CROSS sb 1
In OE the sing galga and the pl galgan are both used for 'a gallows', the pl having reference presumably to the two posts of which the apparatus mainly consisted Occasional examples of the sing form occur in ME, and even down to the 17th c, but from the 13th c onwards the plural galwes and its later phonetic representatives have been the prevailing forms So far as our materials go, CAXTON is the first writer to speak of 'a gallows', though he also uses the older expression 'a pair of gallows', but it is, of course, possible that the pl form was sometimes treated as a sing much earlier From the 16th c gallows has been (exc arch in 'a pair of gallows') used as a sing, with a new plural gallowses, the latter, though perh not strictly obsolete, is now seldom used, the formation is felt to be somewhat uncouth, so that the use of the word in the plural is commonly evaded

Senses 1 and 2 agree with the use of the French word The further development up one to confusion with F garnison (Garnison), which had the same meanings of 'defence' and 'supplies', as well as that of 'garrison' There is not sufficient evidence to show that the last was ever a common sense of F garison Godefroy gives only one quotation for it It seems probable that the specially English sense of 'fortress', 'stronghold' (see 3), led to the identification of the two words and to the final adoption of 'garrison' in place of 'garrison']

Gas (gæs), sb Pl gases (gæ·sez) Forms 7–8 gass, 8–9 gas, 7– gas [A word invented by the Dutch chemist, J B Van Helmont (1577–1644), but avowedly suggested by the Gr χάος ('halitum illum Gas vocavi, non longe a Chao veterum secretum' Ortus Medicinæ, ed 1652, p 59 a), the Dutch pronunciation of g as a spirant accounts for its being employed to represent Gr χ

Van Helmont's statement having been overlooked, it has been very frequently supposed that he modelled his word on Du geest spirit, an idea found at least as early as 1775 (Priestley On Air Introd 3) Van H also invented the term Blas, which has not survived, while gas has been adopted (usually in the same form) in most European languages, the spelling in F and Pg gaz, which was also employed by English writers for a time]

† 1 An occult principle supposed by Van Helmont to be contained in all bodies, and regarded by him as an ultra-rarefied condition of water (see quot 1662) Obs

3 spec a Gas of a kind suitable to be burnt for illuminating or heating purposes, originally, and still chiefly, = Coal-gas, but now including various artificial mixtures consisting chiefly of carburetted hydrogen, and distinguished by defining words indicating the source from which they are obtained, as water-gas, oil gas, etc

The first experiments in the use of coal-gas for illumination are said to have been made by Dr Clayton, rector of Crofton about 1688 , the practical introduction of gas lighting was due to Murdoch 1792–1808

Gat, obs † GATE, GOAT, pa t of GET v

[Gatchers see List of Spurious Words]

Gate (gē·t), sb 1 Forms a 1 ȝeat, ȝet (Northumb ȝeæt, ȝeat(t), 2–4 ȝeat, (3 giate), 2–6 ȝet, 3–5 ȝat(t)e, 3–5, 6–9 dial yat t'e, 4–6 yhate, yet, ȝett, 5–6 yat(e, 7–9 dial yeat(t, 6– Sc yett β. (1 pl gatu), 2– gat, (4 gatte, 5 gaytt, 6 gaat), 3– gate [OE geat str neut, cognate formally to OFris gat, jet, hole, opening, Ob gat eye of a needle (LG and Du gat gap, hole, breach), ON gat (see GAT)—OTeut type gato*m The word is wanting in Goth and OHG

The ulterior etymology is obscure Some scholars refer the word to the root of GET v, supposing the etymological sense to be either 'receptacle' (hence 'cavity', 'hole', 'opening') or 'means of reaching' (hence 'way of access') It is however very uncertain whether it is allied either to GET or to GATE sb!

The original OE declension was gat, gates, gate in the sing, and gatu, a, um in the plur, according to the phonetic law by which a became æ exc when a back vowel followed in the next syllable Subsequently the g (=ȝ) before æ became palatalized, and the influence of the palatal ȝ caused the change of æ into ea Hence the stem assumed the two forms ȝeat and gat, which are respectively represented by the a and β types in the later language In late OE the functional distinction between these types was already disappearing through the operation of analogy, so that we find such forms as gates, gate (sing) and geatu, geatum (pl), in Mercian the forms geatu, um (with gutural) are earlier, having due not to analogy but to the phonetic laws of the dialect In ME the two forms are universal in northern and in north and west midland writers, and also prevailed in the s w (Robert of Gloucester, the South Eng Legendary, etc), the MSS of Chaucer have gate in some passages and gate in others Since the 16th c. gate has been the sole form in literary English, dialectally the forms with y remain in northern and north midland districts, so far as they have not been displaced by the influence of the literary language, occasionally they are found surviving elsewhere, as in N Devon and at Banbury (Ellis Pronunc Eng Dialects)]

When the meaning of the word came to be misunderstood (see 2), attempts were made to assign to it an etymology, expressive of the custom of equal division of a deceased person's land among his male children, favourite explanations in the 16th c were 'give al kinde' (Rastell 1557), and 'give all kyn' (Lambarde 1576), sometimes the word was written in pseudo etymological fashion as gavealkin, gavealkind. The application of the Kentish term to the Welsh and Irish system of succession led to the notion that the word was of Celtic origin a Welsh derivation from gafael to take, and cenedl race, family, was proposed in the 16–17th c an alleged Irish gabhail cine (from gabhail to take, taking, and cine tribe, sept) was the Irish rendering 'gavelkind' in O'Reilly's Irish Dictionary]

1 The name of a land-tenure existing chiefly in Kent

The name implies that it was originally a tenure by 'gavel', i e by the payment of rent or fixed services other than military, this agrees with the identification of it with SOCAGE (quot 1755) After the 13th c the special form of socage was distinguished by certain customs elsewhere generally disused (cf quot 1702) Of these the most conspicuous was the custom by which a tenant's land at his death was divided equally among his sons hence, even in early times, 'gavelkind' and 'partible land' are used as equivalent terms

In medical Latin gelatina was adopted as a term for 'any sort of clear gummy juice, as the Juice of Fruits, the Jelly of Quinces, etc.' (Phillips, ed. Kersey 1706), in the 18th c. the F. gélatine was occasionally used in medical books in this sense, and with the rise of scientific chemistry came to be restricted to its present use. On the analogy of this and some other words, the suffix -ine (see -INE, -IN) was adopted by chemists for forming names of 'extractive principles'. In popular use the spelling is commonly gelatine, and the pronunc. is often (dʒelătēˑn), in chemical use consistency demands the form gelatin.]

1 The substance which is the basis of the jellies into which certain animal tissues (skin, tendons ligaments, the matrix of bones, etc.) are converted when treated with hot water for some time. It is amorphous, brittle, without taste or smell, transparent, and of a faint yellow tint, and is composed of carbon, hydrogen, nitrogen, oxygen, and sulphur

It is used in the preparation of soups, jellies, etc., and latterly in many photographic processes. It is also pressed into thin sheets for making transparent cards.
